THE GARDEN OF GETHSEMANE.

Although well aware that the most intense animosity has long existed between the Greek and Latin (Roman) Churches at Jerusalem, the Book says it was hardly prepared for the fact that it was so recently assumed, by the Roman Catholics for many years have had possession of a plot of ground which they occupy the exact site of the Garden of Gethsemane, where the Betrayal of Our Lord took place, but the alleged facts are disputed by competent judges. But the Book, by the writing which was ascribed to the Latin Church, and wornwood in the Greeks, and the discovery on their walls, have now practically set about planting another Gethsemane at great distance from the first, the authenticity of which will doubtless be guaranteed by the Holy Eastern Patriarch in due time.

Let me draw the portrait of a man destined to a long life. He is rather of the middle size, and somewhat thick-set. His complexion is not so tawny as the Italian's. His features rather of the north. His hair approaches rather to the fair than the black; his skin is porous, but not rough. His nose is straight, but not too far from the extremities; and his shoulders are rather round than flat. His neck is not too long; and his hands are large, but not too deeply clothed. His foot is rather thick than long, and his legs are firm and round. He has also a broad rounded chest, a strong voice, and the faculty of retaining his breaths for a long time without difficulty. In general there is a complete harmony in all his parts. His senses are good, but not too delicate; his pulse is slow and regular. His stomach is excellent, his appetite good, and his digestion easy. He eats slowly, and has not too much thirst. The great thirst is always a sign of rapid self-consumption. In general he is serene, unassuming, active, susceptible of joy, serene, and full of nature's vigor, and avarice. His passions never become too violent or destructive. If he ever gives way to anger, he experiences rather a useful glow of warmth, an artificial and gentle fever, without an overflowing of the gall. He is fond also of employment, particularly calm meditation and agreeable speculations; is an optimist, is free from anxieties or riddles, and besetles all thoughts of to-morrow.—Hepstead, Art of Prolonging Life.

QUIDA AT BOME

Louise de la Ramée—known to the world, as she has been known to her friends from a baby, by the name of Onida, an infamous corruption of her baptismal name, as "Bog," was in Charles Dickens's hands, and she was the press has no right whatever to use any other name in writing about her. The habits of her life are very simple. She has a passion for the open air, and considers the infinite charm of the Italian climate to be the chief cause of her illness. She goes to pass the winter in the south of France, and the summer in the Apennines. From April to October she sits scarcely within doors, except for dinner and to sleep. In autumn and winter she drives out from two to six, either about her beloved Florence, or in the pine-woods around her, or in the country that she has bought, and which she calls by that name. She has two horses of which she is very fond—"Mascherino" and "Diribigio"—and dogs innumerable; the fine dogs "Isa" (the St. Bernard of her painting); that she took with her from England, died this year, and she has made him a marble tombstone, which she has placed in the garden with a little epitaph. The lady Maltese called 'Lili', whilst the snobby Marmuccia sheep-dogs guard the gardens. She rises early, as early as five in summer weather, never writes at any special hour, but only when the humor takes her; dresses and paints in the morning, and goes to bed in the evening. In December to June, at least her occupations are on tea or coffee, wine or cigarettes, though Ouida never smokes herself and never touches wine. She professes respect for the English

"The sea reveals not the treasures consigned to its care; the ocean does not give up its dead."

A terrible temptation smote Eilipson bright like a thunderbolt: He himself stood struggle at the terrible thought; but he succeeded in himself.

"It might be said that the child, born curious to look at the sea, had climbed the parapet [which was only three feet high] had gone to sleep there, and other fallen in—said she," "he added with a devilish smile, "that will be no older brother than me, and my mother will be the Count of K."
And the interior of all the wealth,
As he uttered these last words the Count leaped once more towards the water. The waves growled heavily, and seemed to say:
"Send us the child that troubles you;
we will keep him faithfully, and make him pretty grade of seaweed beneath the cur-

for all the earth. Ouida is not tall; she is slightly built, fair, with an oval face, and large eyes of dark blue; her hair, of a golden-brown colour, which used to hang loose over her shoulders, is now braided à la Catherine; she dresses in white almost to the ankles, and wears a white velvet hat with a white veil. As she walked to Amphitryon, chies quai l'on dine, no one knows better than Ouida the uses of a velochet dinner, or the secret of avoiding the commonplace—even in the carle. With a fair share of vanity in her composition, Ouida must confess that she has not the least of intolerance in her; and that might be expected. She looks her opinions rapidly, & reads them freely, and abandons them but seldom; but also can listen to the arguments of others, and recognise their right to differ from her. Ouida is not a person who is easily offended; and she is the ungrateful for the many testimonies to that popularity which she receives. The compliment perhaps which pleased her more than any was when Balzer-Lynton told her that he had read every line that she ever wrote; and amongst the many who have read her, she has many who have written to her not long before she went upon "Folio-Baring," which he considered one of the triumphs of modern English romance.—World.

The Italian started back, turned pale, and almost shrieked with terror, as the stranger thrust him from him, saying:

"Murderer! murderer!"

"What, Bastien?" muttered the Italian, in accents of despair.

"Yes," replied the Hussar, "for it was he—Bastien, whom you thought you had killed on the spot—Bastien, whom the Cossacks found wailing in his blood an hour after your double crime—Bastien, whose life the Russians saved, keeping him prisoner for four years—Bastien, who returns at last to demand the blood of the murderer in return for that of Armand de Kerguel!"

"You lie!" shouted the Italian, shaking

From head to foot.

At that moment the little Armand, who Pelpon supposed he had thrown into the sea, entered the room. The Italian staggered back, and then rushed to the room overlooking the cliff, hoping that his latest crime might have been a dream. There, however, was the empty bed, and looking down into the sea once more, he saw floating on the water beneath an infant's hat bearing a white feather.

"My God!" he cried, "this is a just punishment. I have sinned my own child!"

Before the wretched man could be restrained by these who had followed him he leaped over the parapet and sank with a shriek into the abyss below.

As Bastien and the Countess gazed stricken over the cliff, they seemed the ocean saying: "The sea reveals not its secrets to the living; but it exacts payment for its trust!"

RUSSIAN SCENERY.

Grassy pastures stretching their blue outlines on the grey morning sky, dark steeples, a few tall roofs, an occasional hamlet, a large mill-rill, a small town with its gables and chimneys, formed the skyline of the landscape.

This country is called the "Paradise of Cossacks," and never was better bestowed. Warm, fertile, black, rich, fertile, and healthy, buried up to their middle in this clean and rich herbage, the female inhabitants of these vast pastures appeared to be surrounded by perfect happiness.

From morn to eve, and from eve to morn, they enjoyed their quiet occupation. With sleepy eyes, amidst the green fields, the delicious repose, and the garbured full-tongued their delicious repose. Their dreams could not realize greater fortune, for they slept and ruminated.—Picturesque Holland, by H. Haccard.

THE RISING GENERATION
A new and interesting feature has

A new and interesting feature has been added to our West End Christmas shopping, and the young gentlemen are to be seen in short jackets and tall hats who have just come home from school for the Christmas holidays. But these young gentlemen are very different indeed from the juvenile rascals whom John Leech used to draw, whose chief delights were saving the legs off dining-room chairs, tripping up the butler in a quiet corner of the hall, bullying their schoolmates, and driving their fathers into a vague wish that they had never been born. The new generation of school boys, as we see them in Oxford Street and Regent Street, are very different from these terrible young rumps. They walk in the most sedate and formal fashion, scarcely daring to turn their head lest they should disarrange their hair. They are very much afraid of their fathers. As they walk one may see them have an eye for a pretty girl, and they consider themselves rather knowing about diggers. Now, how can a Christmas party of the present day be like the Christmas party of our forefathers, if we have those precocious youths already imbibing the principles of the age, and disposed to regard paterfamilias with disfavour, and to regard the Christmas party as a nuisance? The old Christmas is passing away from us. Soon we shall find it only in the illustrated paper, and these will be bought for the amusement of old folk, not to incur the disdain of our boys and girls, who know better than to believe in forced liability.—London Correspondent.

THE BARBER OF DUNSE.
A clergyman, possessing an uncommon amount of good humour, had occasion to lodge for the night, in company with some friends, at the inn of a town, where for certain reasons, we shall denominate Dunse. Requiring the services of a barber, he was recommended by the waiter to Walter Dron, who was represented as excellent at executing jobs or telling a story. This functionary being forthwith introduced, made such display of his art and unmanly dexterity as to leave on the mind as well as the face of his customer a very favourable impression, and so good that he invites him to sit, down to a friendly glass. The mutual familiarity, which the circulation of the bottle produced, served to show off the barber in his happiest mood; and the facetious clergyman, amid the general hilarity, thus addressed him:

"Now, Wattie, I engaged to give you a guinea on the following terms:—That you shall go forwards and backwards over your chair for the space of half-an-hour—leisurely, yet regularly—saying out at every leap—'Here goes I, Wattie Dron, barber of Donegal'; but that, should you utter any other things during the time, you forfeit the reward." Wattie, though no doubt surprised at the absurdity of the proposal, yet, considering how easily he could earn the guinea, and the improbability that such an opportunity would ever again present itself, agreed to the stipulations. The watch was set

And the barber having stripped off his coat, leaning with one hand on the back of the chair, commenced leaping over the sea uniformly repeating in an exulting tone the words prescribed. After matters had gone on for some five minutes smoothly, the clergyman rang the bell, and thus accosted the waiter—"What is the reason, sir, you insist on sending a mad fellow like that, instead of a proper barber, as you pretended he was?" Barber, (leaping)—"Here goes I, Waiter, Dron, barber of Dunee." Waiter—"Oh, sir, I don't know what is the matter; I never saw him in this way all my life. Mr. Dron

Mr. Droon, what—what do you mean?
